Xi is the real authority

Monday's People's Daily article by an "authoritative figure" has gotten all the press, but arguably more important was the speech by Xi published the next day in the same paper. Delivered in January to top officials, the 20,000 character speech is Xi's most extended and detailed statement on the economy since coming to power.

Unfortunately, it is also a mess. The majority of the speech is dedicated to Xi's vague "new development concepts": innovation, coordination, green, open and sharing. He complains about a lack of implementation, but the real problem, in our opinion, is the lack of a coherent vision from Xi himself.

Monday's piece by the "authoritative figure" on the other hand, was striking for its sober assessment of China's economic ills and its advocacy of aggressive reform measures to deal with debt and overcapacity. By all accounts the article was written under the aegis of Xi's top economic advisor Liu He. Some have interpreted the critical nature of the piece as directed at Li Keqiang and the State Council bureaucracy, but we see no evidence for this. The more likely interpretation is that Liu is fighting for influence within Xi's camp for the attention of the leader. Let's hope he gets it.

If readers have any further insight into the article, please get in touch. I look forward to hearing from you.
