Issue No. 122 - January 24, 2017

Dear friends and colleagues,

The last few weeks have seen a spate of annual meetings for ministries and local governments as official attempt to complete important work before the New Year's holiday, which starts Friday. The newsletter will not come out next week, but will resume on Monday February 6.

I will be in Beijing from February 8-24. If you are around and would like to meet, let me know. I look forward to hearing from you!

A changing of the guard?

The past week may come to be seen as a historical turning point. It will perhaps be regarded as the beginning of the "Asian century", the moment when America abandoned its role as global leader and China stepped in to take up the baton.

Looking every bit the impressive statesman, Xi Jinping's keynote address at Davos championed globalization, free trade and the human spirit. While he acknowledged that globalization brings challenges, he also said that it "powered global growth" and must be "invigorated". He struck an optimistic, affirmative tone, saying "The history of mankind tells us that problems are not to be feared."

Donald Trump's inaugural address, in contrast, was full of scary images. He spoke of "American carnage" and a country populated by "children trapped in poverty... rusted-out factories...[and] crime and gangs and drugs". Much of these problems, according to Trump, were rooted in the very globalization that Xi was championing.

Trump's answer to all of this is "protection", a word that he used seven times in his speech. He struck a confrontational tone, promising an "America First" foreign policy that would be at the expense of other countries.

Xi, on the other hand, positioned China as a partner, and a leader, for the world, saying: "We will open our arms to the people of other countries and welcome them aboard the express train of China's development."

Not yet

Yet for all of Xi's lofty rhetoric, China's actions hardly look like those of a country ready to assume the mantle of global leader. While he was championing "open, transparent" trade in Davos, back at home officials were taking measures to further isolate China from the world by further tightening (already tight) capital controls, issuing new restrictions on overseas investment and strengthening information controls.

Let's hope at some point Xi follows up his flowery words with concrete actions. For now it's all empty talk.
